we want you to find things, places, and individual lifestyles that will stay with you your whole life long while enjoying making fresh discoveries and having new conversations.
It is in this spirit that we offer you the opportunity to find some “real gems.”

Wearing beads of light gives beauty to your actions

The moment you put this on our finger in the morning, the day switches on. Your back imperceptibly straightens, and just holding a glass becomes a beautiful act. This ring of spun diamonds in the tiniest of pavé settings creates the impression of a piece of art consisting of a chain of beads of light. For all its simplicity, the design also carries a hint of playfulness, and is so lovely both to wear and to behold that just to look at it is to feel your spirits rise. It's the perfect item not just for special occasions, but for every day.

A globally beloved masterpiece that stands the test of time

This chair, with its graceful curves that make it virtually a work of art, is the Y Chair, a globally beloved masterpiece designed by Hans J. Wegner that was first produced in 1950 and will last its owner their whole life. The deeply stained walnut becomes even more attractive over the years, and perfectly complements both flooring and tatami. Sitting by the window on a fine weekend, slowly turning the pages of a book with a glass of wine in hand – it is times like this that make every day special, is what this chair has to tell us.

Japanese traditional pattern adds flair to your sophisticated everyday Houndstooth tuck pants designed with the greatest attention to their thread and cloth convey a Japanese esthetic. The elegance of the colors of the interwoven indigo and beige threads and the drape of the smooth twill stand out beautifully in every situation. One of the attractions of natural indigo is that its texture develops the more you wear it. Houndstooth is an evergreen pattern that befits both special occasions and ordinary use, making it the perfect addition to your everyday wardrobe.

Functional beauty and high quality. A signature product to fill you with confidence

Brady was established in the English city of Birmingham in 1887. With its glossy, smooth twill fabric, exquisite stitching, leather piping, and designs that complement both casual wear and elegant apparel, this brand has been a favorite of the British royal family and famous celebrities. The STOUR bag was made originally as a fishing bag, and still has the large ring from which a landing net would have hung. Knowing this back story will make you love it even more. This bag embodies the functional beauty and high quality befitting its designation as a signature product, and will make its users both proud and confident.

are those things we want to continue using for always

Photographer

Kiyoko Eto

Born in Osaka in 1976. Now based in Tokyo, where she takes photographs mainly for magazines and books. Her photographs cover a wide range of genres, including people, food, and travel.

Kiyoko Eto, responsible for the photography of this book. She's a photographer whose depictions of scenes from daily life capturing everyday situations and snapshots of her travels are popular on social media, and who enjoys her own style and way of life. We asked her about finding she likes, and her rules for choosing things.

Fond of everyday tableware created by artists, antiques, and pots and pans

Kiyoko Eto was born in Higashi-Osaka, and today, based in Tokyo, takes photographs for publications including magazines and cookbooks. Having seen items made from good-quality materials on a daily basis as part of her job as a photographer, she says she gradually developed an affection for everyday tableware. “My latest fancy is for white porcelain, so everything I’m buying is white. I often go to Korea, both privately and for work, so that may also have influenced me, but I do like to see a white bowl making meals look more appealing.”

She also likes antiques, and says she often buys old tiny mamezara plates and tableware that conveys traditional Japanese techniques. “I’m crazy about artisanal hand-made tableware, but I also like buying kitchen implements, so apart from tableware I tend to buy mostly cheaper stuff,” she says, pointing to a photograph of some aluminum pans she bought on a market in Korea. “For everyday things like boiling eggs or spinach, I only use lightweight pans. In fact, I use them so much that they eventually become dented and I feel thoroughly sorry for them, but I think that’s also part of their charm. These pans weren’t at all expensive, but they do have their own appeal.”

One-off finds come unexpectedly

The basket piled with Japanese teacups was a one-off find, she says. “It’s an artist’s piece woven from akebia vines, and when I use it I think I’ll cherish it for the rest of my life. I found it in a household goods shop near my home. The shop has a great selection of well-designed items, mainly tableware, and sometimes I’ll find something like this there unexpectedly. I’ll buy things from there just because it’s a shop that I trust.”

She found the teacups in the basket nearly 20 years ago in an antiques shop she was visiting as a photographer. “At that time I was still living with my parents, so I had no need to buy tableware, but I thought the day might come when I would need them, and bought, not one, but two teacups! Today they’re coming in really useful, so I’m glad I bought them.”

Eto lives with her husband. “We each travel a lot, both on trips and for business, and don’t get to see that much of each other, so we always try and eat breakfast together. And I do find sometimes that if I don’t eat breakfast, I don’t have any energy. So at breakfast time I try and cook delicious rice in an earthenware pot.”

A relaxing place surrounded by favorite things

Eto often edits her photos in her home. She says that when she finds herself feeling tired, she goes into the kitchen. “I get away from my computer in the office and go and wash the dishes, or if I feel a bit hungry, I’ll eat natto on rice. The kitchen has a window, which makes it pleasant, and perhaps it’s the place where I can most easily relax.”

As all the kitchen utensils are things she’s chosen herself, Eto thinks that perhaps being surrounded by her favorite things is reassuring. “I really don’t have very much stuff, but I’ve made my own decision that having a lot of things in the kitchen is fine,” she laughs.

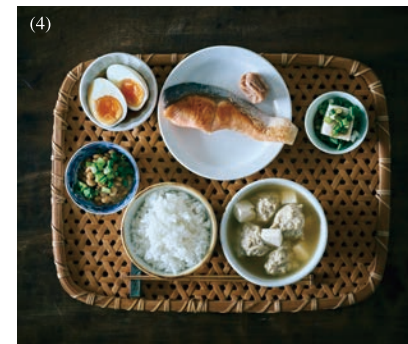

What Eto enjoys is the “pots and pans patrol.” “I can’t help using the things I like best, so I try and think ‘I should really use this bowl today.’ And if there are things I still don’t feel like using, I wonder if I can get rid of them, saying to myself ‘There are only two of us in this household: are we really ever going to use a four-person casserole dish?’ That’s what I do on patrol.”

Perhaps, “real gems” are the things that are important to us individually

On her patrol, Eto also notices things that she wants to keep on using for the rest of her life. “I use this bamboo woven tray every day, and in one place it snapped. I took it back to the shop where I’d bought it, and they said they could repair it, and they did put it right. Look here, I think the pattern is different, but this is also part of its charm. I want to take care of it and carry on using it in future.”

Eto thinks that even items that aren’t expensive but which are dear to us may be “real gems.” “I have plenty of things that I want to treasure for always. Those teacups I just showed you, I think that if they break I’ll put them back together with gold. Though I’ve never tried kintsugi before” she says with a chuckle.

“Real gems” are those things that we love and want to keep on using. Being honest about our own feelings when we choose items may help us create spaces and times in which we feel comfortable.

“You could stick flowers in it, or use it to hold kitchen implements” says Eto of the white enamel measuring cup she chose at Bshop. “I like the pouty shape, too.”

Enjoy the “time and effort” spent on the Japanese traditional pickle-making process

You've always wanted to give it a try, but never quite got round to it. Now this bran pickling container gives you the chance to start making nukazuke pickles. The fetching combination of white enamel and wooden lid makes it right at home in the kitchen, and the rounded corners for easy mixing are another nice touch. The manufacturer, Noda Horo, has a history dating back more than eight decades, and their odor-resistant utensils will be treasured for many years. You'll enjoy taking the time to stir pickles in this pickling container as part of your daily life.

Peerless materials and design from a town famous for jeans

This apron, with its delightfully crisp texture, comes from Kojima in Kurashiki, a city known for its jeans. It is made with indulgent high-thread-count linen, dyed to provide a fine finish. While amazingly lightweight, its smart design is based on European workwear. Care about the parts that people won't see, and choose something well-made just for yourself. It's a simple thing, but one that will make you feel your lifestyle has gone up a notch.

Feel the artisanal skill and passion with your own fingers

When you need to send a warm message, you'll want to choose this pen. The vibrant orange represents the sunlit landscapes of southern Italy at noon, and the navy the color of the sky at sunset. Though at first glance it may look a little flashy, pick it up and it feels so right in your hand that you'll be lost in admiration. The body, carved with the practiced skill of the artisan, has all the playfulness and glamor you expect of an Italian product, enabling your words to flow naturally and smoothly onto the paper. Write each word courteously with your correspondent in mind, and think about what you want to say with even greater care than before.

A one-off find born of traditional skills

With its smooth wood surface and expressive leather, the simple design of this card case stands out, making the action of taking out a meishi business card into a beautiful movement. It is made using the traditional skill of kiji woodturning, one of the processes in the production of Echizen shikki lacquerware. Because the grain of natural wood varies depending on where it is cut from, each item is completely unique, and the changes over time in the wood and leather are also a source of pleasure. Have your initials or name carved into the case, and treasure this real gem over the years.

Made in Japan to snuggle your bare feet

On cold days, socks that keep your feet warm are an absolute essential. These room socks are knitted in Nara, Japan's top sock-producing region. The surface is wool, but the lining which touches the skin is made of pile knit, and its fluffy softness the moment you put them on your feet is a feeling of pure joy. They are deliberately made quite long so that they won't constrict your ankles. You can feel their high-quality warmth, thanks to the attention to detail you expect of items made in Japan and the practiced skills of the artisans who make them, spreading into the depths of your being.
